Staff Leave Approval Tool

Delivery review | Lark Studio | April 2026 | Delivered manager delegation pilot

Fictional demonstration material. All organizations, people, events, and results are invented.

Recorded status and result

The manager-delegation pilot accepted decisions within an active assignment, rejected expired authority, and retained the actual acting reviewer in history.

What happened during delivery

An early interface showed only the principal manager's name in the history. Reviewers could not tell that a delegate had acted. The team corrected the display and decision record before handover. That correction improved traceability; it did not create a policy that delegation should be allowed in every approval workflow.

Checks and their scope

Controlled checks covered an active delegation, expiry before approval, a forged manager identifier, and an attempt to delegate onward. The correct acting and represented identities appeared in accepted decisions. The tests did not include financial limits, branch purchasing authority, or an automated organization-directory integration, and they did not measure employee scheduling outcomes.

Staff Leave Approval Tool / Review notes

Delivery review | Lark Studio | April 2026 | Delivered manager delegation pilot

Fictional demonstration material. All organizations, people, events, and results are invented.

Lesson retained by the team

Represent delegated authority explicitly, evaluate it at decision time, and retain the actual actor. Do not infer spending authority from an unrelated managerial role.

Missing evidence and exclusions

Financial authorization, purchasing delegation policy, directory synchronization, and staffing benefits were not established.

Handover and reuse boundary

The handover included an assignment example, expiry tests, and actor-display rules. A future client should first decide whether delegation is allowed and whether the delegate may perform the same action or only review it. The existence of this project is a reason to ask that question, not a reason to add delegation silently to another project's first release.

Reading this result

This review describes a fictional project record. A limited acceptance check is not proof of future reliability or a measured business benefit. A proposal is not a delivered feature. Where the review states that work was paused, excluded, or unmeasured, that boundary remains part of the record.